

7(IX). SOCIAL IMPACT

You erect transmission towers all over the country. It is only when each nut and bolt is fixed fast and firm, faithfully, that the towers can stand up to the rigorous tests of wind and weather, isn't it? Who can say, how can we judge, whose share is more important and whose is less? The work of each is essential and valuable, so far as his share of the responsibility extends. Each limb must act effectively at the exact juncture to meet the duty entrusted to it and accepted by it, so that the body may live in health and in top efficiency, alert with all its skills and potentialities. This is true also of the enterprises, which man undertakes with others of his kind. Each one must resolve to use his skill and intelligence for the discharge of his obligations.

The relationship between the worker and the employer should be that between the heart and the body. Both are bound intimately with each other; they depend on each other for their very existence. The employer must take upon himself the role of the father and the employees must accept the role of the children, attached by love and gratitude to the father. Love and affection have to govern the relations between the two, not hatred or envy. If the anger and irreverence of a few are allowed to blind the rest, all will suffer.
